After years of Big Tech and governments stifling the Covid debate, the argument that Covid-19 leaked from the virology facility in Wuhan, China (the only Level 4 lab in Asia) is becoming louder.

The WHO, a fierce defender of the Chinese government, abruptly changed its stance last summer when it acknowledged the likelihood of a lab leak. “Substantial evidence suggests that the COVID-19 pandemic was the result of a research-related incident associated with a laboratory in Wuhan,” the Senate Committee on Health, Education, Labor, and Pensions stated in a report last autumn. The Wuhan Lab has also been looked into by the FBI and other intelligence organizations.

The Energy Department is the most recent US government organization to support the theory of lab leaks, according to a report published on Sunday in the Wall Street Journal, which was based on a confidential intelligence analysis given to the White House and key congressional leaders.

Sources told WSJ, “the Energy Department has concluded that the Covid pandemic most likely arose from a laboratory leak.”

The origins of the virus were a matter of debate for the Energy Department. Those who have viewed the classified study said that although the decision is based on fresh evidence, the government played it safe by expressing “low confidence” in its most recent assessment.

The organization shares the FBI’s belief that a Chinese lab breach is to blame for the virus’s origins. According to the Wall Street Journal, two agencies are unsure, while four other agencies and a national intelligence body continue to believe the virus was most likely spread naturally.

Because the Energy Department oversees the US national laboratories, some of which are Level 4 labs, the study is significant.

US officials declined to elaborate on the reasons behind the Energy Department’s shift in thinking regarding Covid’s origin. They claimed that the FBI and the agency arrived at the same conclusions for various reasons.

Everyone who mentioned the lab leak origin

after the epidemic struck was branded a “conspiracy theorist” by the mainstream media and Big Tech social media platforms.

A recent Twitter Files leak revealed how the government and Big Tech were distorting the discussion surrounding the origins of Covid.

The complicated story that the government, non-governmental organizations, big business, and mainstream media constructed around Covid is unraveling, which is why the Energy Department has recently changed course.
